Salem Art Fair & Festival

73rd Annual Salem Art Fair & Festival

July 15–17, 2022 | Bush's Pasture Park • Salem

We have an exciting new footprint! Artist booths, the main stage, and food courts can all be found in the meadow, along High Street.

This layout is bigger and better than ever! It'll be easier to catch a show during the day with the new stage location—and you'll be closer to the food and beverage courts. We're confident that everyone will have a great time!

New Stage Location

To minimize disruption in the neighborhood, we've consulted with our neighbors, their association, and the City regarding showtimes and the orientation of the stage.

We're also adding a picket-style fence perimeter around most of the Art Fair's footprint, especially along High Street. There will be a few areas that have 6' fencing.

How these changes impact exhibiting artists at the Art Fair

We've had to move the artists booths and stage from their traditional locations in the trees to the meadow area of the park. We also have to limit vehicle traffic to the paved areas in order to avoid further compacting the soil in the park—beyond what the foot traffic will do. We know that this may be inconvenient or challenging for some of our artists, and we are doing everything possible to help with load-in and load-out.

When it comes to forthcoming books, the Powell's Book Buying team are the ones to look to for recommendations. They know what they're talking about, and they were kind enough to put together this list of 21 books they can't wait to read this summer (and one coming out this fall that they really can't wait for), with topics that range from "the California Vivian Maier" to engineered environments to the Children of God cult to magic tutorships to Norwegian fairy tales. Take our word for it: you'll want to trust their recommendations and put in your preorders now.

Change and the Brain

When your routines change, it is a challenge for the brain. We're hardwired to resist change. Routines are safe and we know what to expect. But, the amygdala can interpret the change as threatening (even mildly), and this resistance manifests itself in the fight/flight response; we want to refuse to change or avoid it, put it off and pretend that it really isn't necessary or consider it someone else's fault.

Much like Kubler-Ross' stages of loss, we may need to go through stages towards accepting the change. Denial is common and a way to avoid facing the need to change. When it becomes apparent or imperative that the change be made, we may just get angry – asking why and just being generally upset. Bargaining is a way we try to negotiate the change within ourselves. "If only" allows us to vent and at the same time, ease into the possibilities within the change. This can sometimes lead to small levels of depression when we realize that it will take time and we become clear that the change is inevitable. Accepting the change is the healthiest stage because we relax and engage in the change – even if slightly – and gain the benefits of embracing the change.

Studies show that change is actually good for the brain. It can improve both physical and mental health. In fact, we change and adapt every day – we step around a puddle, we hurry to cross at the lights, we change our minds about what to buy or eat, etc. These changes are made in the prefrontal cortex and the more you use it for decision-making, the healthier it will be.

Though change is naturally more difficult as we age, it's beneficial to our cognitive health to stimulate and encourage it. And the more you stretch your brain beyond its comfort, the more it will be receptive to other types of change. So, on a regular basis, change up your routines – take a different route or walk, try a new food or recipe, shop at a different store, say 'yes' to something you would normally not agree to, or 'no' to something you regularly accept. See where your changeup takes you and enjoy the journey.
